10 Mobile Apps for Leaders in High School

On March 12, 2013, Apple introduced the Apple iWatch, a device that aims to do a lot more than just glance at your phone. In fact, Apple's wearable and mobile device is set to redefine the way we use technology. With the Apple iWatch, wearable technology will be able to connect to your iPhone, allowing you to easily see notifications, access your health information, and even make calls. Other users can also view real-time data on your movement, energy level, and even calories burned. I'm certainly looking forward to using this innovative device as it's released next year. While wearable technology is exciting, it isn't the only exciting new technology to be introduced. Apple revealed a slew of new products aimed at students, as well. Three mobile apps are available for students and educators to download for iPad or iPhone. Some of the features of each app include: Gradebook: This mobile app will provide teachers and administrators with instant access to the grades of students and an interactive calendar of each student's activities. Students can also earn and manage their own badges for good work. Assignment: This app is one of the few mobile apps for students to use in the real-world. Using GPS coordinates and images uploaded by the user, this app is able to calculate how fast a student or group of students can cover a certain distance. Online communities: Students, teachers, and parents can connect with one another and learn from one another. Users can create a profile and upload a statement to the community, which can be viewed by other users. The community can also send messages to one another, which will be delivered immediately. While we can't yet put price tags on these apps, we do know that Apple charges an annual fee of $99.99 for students with an iPad or $139.99 for families of students with an iPhone. I don't
